THE GLEN PARK NEIGHBORHOODS HISTORY PROJECT (GPNHP)

Founded in 2014, the GPNHP covers the San Francisco neighborhoods located immediately south of Twin Peaks, including Glen Park, Glen Canyon, Sunnyside, Fairmount Heights, and Diamond Heights. The GPNHP works to rediscover our forgotten histories, document our living histories, and share our histories with others so that these histories may be conserved for current and future generations. In recognition of our work, we received the Walter G. Jebe, Sr. Neighborhood Award from the San Francisco History Association in 2016.

During our research, we have discovered that women of our district co-led America's first suffrage march in 1908 and fought to return Glen Canyon to public access; another woman played a significant part to ensure the rights for all under the First Amendment were respected; and the legacy of yet another woman continues to contribute to the arts through philanthropy. The list goes on. Famously, the Glen Park Gum Tree Girls did not back down when a viaduct freeway planned by local and state governments threatened to forever change the quality of life in the district.

The Glen Park Neighborhoods History Project is fiscally sponsored by Independent Arts & Media, a California non-profit corporation.

In 1948, a system of highways that would crisscross San Francisco was planned. One, the Circumferential Expressway, was to bisect Glen Park and Glen Canyon Park to create a shortcut to the Golden Gate Bridge.

Then in 1965, the freeway plan returned. Glen Park moms Zoanne Theriault Nordstrom, Joan Seiwald, and Geri Arkush organized the Save Glen Park Committee to say “No!” to the freeway through Glen Park and Glen Canyon. Known as the Glen Park Gum Tree Girls, they continued fighting until 1970 when the last of multiple attempts to force the freeway through the district failed. Without their moxie, the quality of life in the district would have been forever changed.
